Lead Story Headline Revolutionary War inspires imaginations

By: Nancy Longino

There are many things that go into writing a good paper or planning a good art project. One might compare it to building a house. Think about it: if you do not take the time to plan for construction, the house will fall. The students in Coach. Boe Parr's History Class at Celeste Jr. High School had to plan and research the project they were assigned in great depth. Coach Parr had them pick one subject, ranging from the "Battle of Bunker Hill", "Lexington", "The Boston Tea Party", "George Washington", to "The Boston Massacre". The focus was on the revolutionary war and the events that occurred during the battles that affected the war's outcome. Research was done in the library as well as in the classroom - finalizing works cited and their presentations. Project originality as well as the overall presentation was the basis of their grades.

Some recreated models, such as the group who created a recreation of the "Boston Massacre" complete with guns and rockets, while others focused on food, games or creating a poster board. Each presentation was informative and inspired the other groups to work even harder. Coach Parr's project was set forth in hopes that the students would be able to explain why the battle was important and how it influenced the final outcome of the revolutionary war.
